Alderman calls Calgary Parking Authority "out of control"

Alderman Diane Colley-Urquhart is calling the Calgary Parking Authority "a bit out of control," after a city committee shot down the authority's request for a boost in parking fines.

The move means the city will have to find another million dollars in revenue when budget talks begin on Monday.

That doesn't phase Colley-Urquhart and fellow Alderman Dale Hodges. They tell The Calgary Herald the city has to stop looking for increased revenues and instead turn to cutting spending to deal with the budget.

The committee's decision comes on the heels of the parking authority saying they are bringing in a new rate structures for parkers at their lots around the city.
