Some aldermen looking to review parking costs downtown

January 26, 2009 - 6:41 am
660 News Staff

A couple of aldermen are going to bat for distraught downtown parkers.

Aldermen Diane Colley-Urquhart and Ric McIver will be asking why if the new Parkplus system makes the jobs of 30 meter readers obsolete, then why hasn't the parking authority saved any money in staffing costs?

The Calgary Sun reports, they'll then ask for the latest hike in parking fees to be rolled back.

This comes as there's with word the city's auditor will be looking into the tender granting process of the controversial pedestrian bridges to span the Bow river.

The tender for the bridges was given out without a public process.
